

Parliaments and Economic Development in Kuwait and the UAE: A Comparative Study

This book examines the role of parliaments in economic development in Kuwait and the UAE. It provides a comparative analysis of the two countries' political and economic systems, and explores how the relationship between the legislature and the executive has shaped economic policy and outcomes.

Kuwait and the UAE are two of the richest countries in the world, thanks to their vast oil reserves. However, they have taken different approaches to economic development. Kuwait has a more centralized political system, with the ruling family playing a dominant role in decision-making. The UAE, on the other hand, has a more decentralized political system, with the federal government sharing power with the seven emirates.

This book argues that the different political systems of Kuwait and the UAE have had a significant impact on their economic development. In Kuwait, the centralized political system has allowed the ruling family to pursue a more interventionist approach to economic development. This has led to the creation of a large public sector and a heavy reliance on oil revenues.

In the UAE, the decentralized political system has given the emirates more autonomy in economic decision-making. This has led to a more diversified economy, with a greater emphasis on private sector development. The UAE has also been more successful in attracting foreign investment.

This book provides a valuable comparison of the two countries' political and economic systems. It offers insights into the role of parliaments in economic development, and the challenges that these countries face in diversifying their economies and reducing their dependence on oil.
